INSTRUCTIONS FOR CONTRIBUTORS

Journalism Educator's editorial province is limited to matters of journalism and mass communication education at the college and university level. Its mission is to help educators and administrators to stay current and to do their jobs better.

Manuscripts do not go through a multiple review process. Hence, JE is not a refereed journal in the traditional sense.

Contributors are encouraged to use text and citation styles prescribed in the Publications Manual of the American Psychological Association. However, it is also permissible for contributors to use the Chicago Manual of Style. Legal citations may follow Harvard University's A Uniform System of Citation. Contributors are responsible for the accuracy and consistency of whatever style they choose.

Authors should send one copy of their manuscript to the new editor, James A. Crook. Until May 15, manuscripts should be sent to Crook at the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications, Syracuse University, Syracuse, NY 13210. After May 15, manuscripts should be sent to Crook at the College of Communications, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, TN 37996.

Journalism and mass comm enrollment leveled off in '87

By Paul V. Peterson

Enrollment in schools and departments of journalism and mass communication grew by only .13 percent between 1986 and 1987, the smallest change since records began to be kept in 1937.

In the autumn of 1987, 190 schools reported a total of 88,777 students, compared to 88,661 by 180 schools in 1986, for a difference of 116 students overall. A comparison of enrollments for schools that reported this year but not in 1986 reveals a difference of just 86 students, indicating the .13 percent is a valid indication of no change.

As it has since 1981, Michigan State led all reporting schools with 3,925 majors, followed by Texas-Austin with 2,556, Syracuse with 2,218, and California State-Fullerton with 2,086. As is indicated in Table 3, while all these schools increased their enrollments, the growth was small, again reflecting the stability of 1987 enrollments when compared to 1986.

Enrollment data reported in this and previous articles should be carefully interpreted. Not every school that says it offers a major responds to the annual survey, and many schools that do respond keep records in ways that make it difficult for them to provide information in the form requested.

For the purposes of this survey, a major is defined as a person who 1) is under the administrative control of a school or department of journalism or mass communication, and 2) is being prepared for future employment in the mass media. Such employment includes work in newspapers, magazines, advertising, public relations, broadcasting, photojournalism and general mass media. The terms "journalism" and "news-editorial" are not considered synonymous for purposes of this survey.

I contacted 243 schools and 190 responded. Although some schools did not respond, sufficient data have been gathered, in this and previous studies, to indicate trends and permit meaningful comparisons.

The trend toward more majors in advertising and public relations, noted in the early 1970s, continues, as noted in Table 1. And that same table also indicates that the approximately 60 percent female to 40 percent male ratio, a fact for the past eight years or so, also continues. It was in 1977 that the ratio became 50:50 after having held to a 60:40 ratio in favor of males for some 40 years.

There were some aberrations in this year's data. For example, Ohio State has almost doubled its enrollment in the past two years, mainly because it added an advertising sequence in Autumn 1985. Kent State, because of a change in departmental jurisdiction, increased its enrollment considerably over the past few years. And the figures for Michigan, submitted by the registrar's office, indicated no undergraduates, just 17 master's, and no doctoral students.

A number of schools reported their enrollments as "holding steady," based on the institution of enrollment management plans over the past several years, as a means of coping with more students than facilities or faculty can handle.

Particularly helpful in this survey were the reports from the historically black schools, such as Hampton, Norfolk State, Jackson State and Howard. These reports make it possible to better assess the number of black students enrolled in journalism and mass communication programs, and also their journalistic interests. Table 15, when compared with a similar table for 1986, indicates a growth in the number of minority students, with the exception of the category of American Indian/Alaskan Natives.

Table 16, relating to degrees granted, speaks specifically to the number and areas of interest

Peterson, a professor in the School of Journalism at Ohio State, has conducted the annual enrollment survey of journalism and mass communication programs for more than 15 years.

of minority students as reported. And as always, a number of schools do not report minority enrollments or graduates, mainly because such information is not readily available. Thus, the figures for both tables probably err on the low side, and there are more minority students and graduates than indicated here.

It should also be pointed out that sequence or interest totals should be not taken as absolutes, for a number of programs report every enrollee in one sequence, regardless of student employment interest. Rutgers and California State-Northridge are examples of such schools, reporting all students in the news-editorial category.

In sum, it appears that enrollment in schools and departments of journalism has leveled off, but at record numbers, students continue to be predominantly white, females interested in advertising and public relations, and dominated by the "big" schools, those schools that enroll 500 or more students and annually account for approximately 65 to 70 percent of the total enrollment. Such characteristics have held for surveys for the past 10 years, and it would appear no significant changes are likely to occur in the near future.

A personal note, if you will: The author, who has conducted these annual surveys since 1968, wishes to thank the many deans, directors, assistants and secretaries who have aided in this task. He will retire from the faculty of Ohio State in September and pass the task to a person who is eminently qualified to continue the tradition. Professor Lee Becker will assume the task in the Autumn of 1988. Again, a special thanks to everyone who helped, in whatever form, during the past 20 years. Without each of you, these surveys could not have been done.

Notes:

(1) The above figures are based on "degrees reported," and should not be construed as the same thing as degrees granted.

(2) Some schools do not report minority figures, and thus the totals shown here are likely under the actual numbers.

See pages 74-80 for a complete report on enrollment by school.

1987 enrollments in journalism and mass communication

The data on the following pages summarize, by school and department, enrollments in journalism and mass communications in the autumn of 1987. The data were collected by Professor Paul V. Peterson of the Ohio State University.

The list of schools on the following pages differs from the lists of schools participating in the 1986 survey reported in the Spring 1987 issue of Journalism Educator.
